“ Delmon was a good friend and classmate, he was very smart and loved history. I remember American History class when Delmon laid his head on his desk and went to sleep while the teacher was lecturing. She saw that he was asleep and did not disturb him. Near the end of the class period she gave a pop test on the lecture. Woke Delmon up and handed him the test expecting him to fail. He promptly answer the questions and turned in the test. To her amazement he had aced the test.

I worked at the mill with Delmon for lots of years and he was always one of the happiest men around. He always came in my office with a smile and something nice to say. He was a joy to work with.
